Any information and opinions provided below is well-reasoned and insightful but not a substitute for good judgment. The Captain is responsible for the safety of passengers and operations of their vessel. Besides, the author of this flier is married and carry's no cash.

History (Sausalito Historical Society):

The Coast Miwok occupied the stretch of shoreline and hills that is now Sausalito. In 1775, the first European explorers arrived and called the area "Saucito" (little willow) after the small willow trees growing along the stream banks. This evolved into "Saucelito," and ultimately "Sausalito."

In 1838, William Richardson, built his hacienda in the vicinity Caledonia Street but ultimately lost his vast holdings to the Sausalito Land and Ferry Company. Ferries led to railroads and Sausalito became a bustling transportation hub with wealthy San Franciscans in gracious summer homes and Victorian Mansions in the hills. A vibrant working class and mercantile culture developed along Water Street (later to become Bridgeway), including Portuguese boatbuilders, Chinese shopkeepers, dairy ranchers, fishermen, Italian and German merchants, boarding house operators and railroad workers.

During Prohibition, Sausalito became a base of operation for bootleggers among them "Baby Face" Nelson. With the onset of World War II, a major shipyard was hastily constructed on the northern waterfront swelling Sausalito's tiny population to 30,000. The Marinship yard operated 24/7 until September of 1945, producing 93 Liberty Ships and tankers for the war effort.

As abruptly as it began, the war effort ended. Attracted by Sausalito's striking beauty and cheap rents, artists, writers, musicians, actors, hippies and even a former bordello owner took refuge here, bringing their culture and free-thinking to Sausalito.

In honor to Sausalito's founder, William Richardson, the body of water fronting Southern Marin County is called Richardson's Bay.
